

Clothes for all weathers: snow-proof fur coat and heatwave outfit.

Eye-catching stretch-jersey suit that wouldn't stretch so much on a man.

WHAT a deliciously confusing affair fashion has become.

The clothes on these pages are all intended for men—yes, even the maxi culotte outfit on the left. But when they were shown in Paris last week the models were girls.

The reason: merely to intrigue.

Says Pierre Cardin, who designed the clothes: "Girls today want a boy who looks like a girl and makes love like a man."

For the modern lover Cardin provides a wardrobe of stretch-jersey walking suits, super-shaggy fur coats, sci-fi-style plastic breastplate, topless beach overalls—and, for evening wear, those lotte outfit in silk. Apart from advanced taste, the Cardin-style lover could have a big bank balance, or a wealthy mistress. Like all Cardin designs, these are very, very dear. Cardin is, of course, known best for dressing women. But he is happy to use his talent to design anything interesting. He has designed cars and the theatre.

He is celebrated for his robust views and spartan habits. His own taste in clothes is for sober lounge suits, and at 47 he doesn't intend joining the boys—or should it be the girls?

Says Cardin: "The fashions I create are too young for me."
